even bigger to the mind's eye as it recedes into the retrospect.

They tell many amusing and some touching incidents of their visit. Perhaps the most beautiful of them all was the scene on which the curtain fell. The spacious pariors of Colonel James Anderson were filled with scores of old vecerans, while a sprinkling of young life added vivaelty to the scene, and the parting hour had come. Tender and appropriate words had been uttered by a number of the speakers on either side, and it was that pause before the final breakup which somebody selzed and cried "Join ands." In an instant the Gray and the Blue, the old and she young, joined Bille, the old and the young, joined hands and began to sing "Blest be the Tie that Binds." Tears stood in many eyes. As the last note of the song d'ed out, Mr. Saward said; "Dr. Baitle, pronounce the benediction." The minister untered a few fervent sentences of prayer and the great meeting was at end. and the great meeting was at end.

At the station hundreds had assembled to bid the Confederates farewell. The "Yankee" yell was given, and amid cries of "Long live the Confederates," the men from Petersburg started for their homes.
